SECTION A – READING

A1. Read the given seen passage carefully and answer the questions.

Water conservation is a practice that has existed for centuries. Even hundreds of years ago, there were huge water storage structures. These did not just store water but also protected cities from floods, provided drinking water and brought people together.
Today in many parts of India, many communities still practice the traditional water management methods. In Tamil Nadu, Ooranis store rainwater for drinking and farming. In Kerala, PanamKeni wells are known for not drying up even in the hottest months. Similarly, Tankas are quite common in Rajasthan's Thar region. They are underground tanks that can store enough water for six to seven months.
